3. Institute/Department:

The field covered by the Hans-Bredow-Institut for Media Research is public communication via the media. The media are today determining people’s everyday life, politics, the economy as well as culture to a greater extent than ever before. The Institute’s primary goal is to understand this role as performed by the media – by the traditional, but also by the respectively new ones – to assess new developments and the chances and risks attendant on them and to develop options for taking action. In this way, the Institute makes a contribution to the continual observation and reflection of the basis of communication in society; at the same time, it brings its expertise to bear on creating the media and communications landscape.

The Institute emphasizes its role as an independent observer and combines sociological, legal, economic and pedagogical approaches, because it strongly believes that contemporary problems of media development call for an interdisciplinary and a cross-national comparative perspective. Cooperation and constant exchange with the different actors in the media sphere are basic values for the Institute’s research.
